Creative Brief

Lydia Park
10/28/2026

Project Title: Carrying Home, a Do Ho Suh Website

1. Project overview

The goal of my website is to be informational, but to present Do Ho Suh's life and work in a way that feels like walking through one of his fabric houses: quiet, layered, and personal. I want people to understand not just what he made, but why, and how his own moves between Seoul, the US, and London shaped the work.

2. Resources

Copy is available at https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Do_Ho_Suh. Images of his work can come from his galleries (Lehmann Maupin and Victoria Miro) and from the museums that have shown it, like Tate Modern and the Smithsonian. Every image will be credited on the Sources page. My content outline lists what goes on each page.

3. Goals

- Let the artwork lead, with large images and short, clear text around them.
- Make the Selected Works page easy to browse, with the title, year, and materials for each piece always in the same place.
- Work well on phones, tablets, and desktops, and meet basic accessibility (readable contrast, alt text that describes each artwork, keyboard-friendly nav).

4. Audience

This is a strictly informational site and won't be promoted commercially. It will be part of my portfolio, so my instructors and classmates will review it, and prospective employers may see it too. Beyond that, the audience is people interested in art, design, and architecture, as well as anyone who has moved away from home and might connect with the work. Readers shouldn't need an art history background.

5. Message

Home isn't only a place, it's something you carry with you. Do Ho Suh turns houses and rooms into soft, see-through fabric that can be folded up and moved, and I want the site to show how that idea connects his family, his moves between countries, and the way he thinks about memory and identity.

6. Tone

Quiet, reflective, and intimate, like a calm gallery visit. It should feel thoughtful and personal, not loud or overly academic. The writing should be clear and simple, and the design should leave a lot of space so the work can breathe.

7. Site structure

Seven pages: Home, Early Life, Education and Moving, Themes and Materials, Selected Works, Exhibitions and Recognition, and Sources. Navigation across the top on desktop, collapsing into a menu on mobile. Each page opens with one large image and a short intro. The Selected Works page uses a grid of cards (image, title, year, materials) that goes from one column on phones to two or three on desktop, and the Education and Moving page uses a simple timeline.

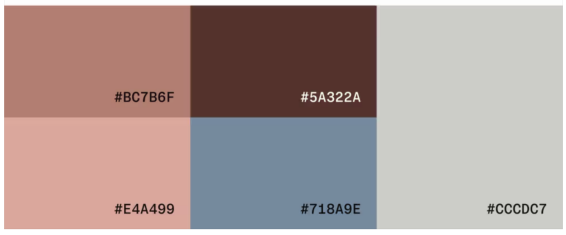

8. Visual Style

I want the site to feel soft and layered, the way his fabric pieces are see-through and glow when light hits them. I'm thinking about using slightly transparent color panels that overlap images and text, thin outlines that feel like architectural drawings or floor plans, and a lot of empty space around everything. Images should be big, and the interface should stay out of the way.

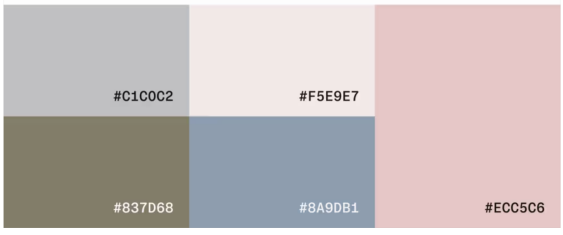

Typography: a clean, elegant serif for headings and a simple sans-serif for body text, both from Google Fonts. Small, spaced-out uppercase labels for details like year and materials. If I include his Korean name, I'll use a font that supports Korean, like Noto Serif KR.

Photography: installation photos of his work, especially the fabric houses and rooms where you can see light coming through. Close-ups of seams, stitching, and fixtures (like door handles and light switches) could work as detail shots between sections.

Color: here are my two palettes. The soft pinks, slate blues, and grays feel close to the colors of his translucent fabric works. The light pink (#F5E9E7) works as the page background, the dark brown (#5A322A) for text and headings, and the dusty pinks, slate blues, and olive (#837D68) for panels, overlays, and accents. The lighter colors should stay as backgrounds so text stays readable.

Palette 1: warmer colors, for headings, text, and accents

Palette 2: softer colors, for backgrounds, panels, and overlays